BROWNED OFF

If Perpegillum Brown is an average American, I am an eel from Alpha Ceti Six.

I don't know exactly what the English and the scriptwriters and authors at the BBC think of the Americans, but from what I have seen on Doctor Who, I am offended.

All of the American characters that I have seen on Doctor Who are (in the immortal words of Douglas Adams - a noted British author and Doctor Who scriptwriter/editor) complete and absolute knee-biters.

Mr Robert (Bob) Filer in Claws Of Axos, Perpegillum's uncle, and Peri herself are all portrayed as knee-biters. Why do Americans call the Doctor "Doc"? He hates it and it's even offensive to me. The only swearing I have ever heard on Doctor Who comes from the mouths of Americans. Americans are not all stupid and crude. Those who have no taste, and probably a low intelligence - like those members of any other culture.

Perpegillum. Not an average American name. I have never even heard it before. I doubt many Americans ever have.

Peri, I admit, has a lot of spunk, sort of like Sarah-Jane Smith. I enjoyed the scene in Planet Of Fire where Peri is chasing the Master around with a shoe. Unfortunately, Peri can't swim 14 meters to the mainland, drowns while carrying a floating plastic bag, goes bouncing across the mountains in shorts and pumps, and announces her infinite intelligence by saying a famous line: "It must be platinum." The last statement shows, a know-it-all attitude, and not just a little bit of greed on the American part.

Another thing, I understand the 'demand' for "more leg" from the companions. As I have noticed, usually the female companions end up wearing less and less as the season progresses. Not a very practical way to go gallivanting around the Universe, is it?

For example, Nyssa of Traken, the supposedly innocent companion, drops her skirt rather inexplicably when she gets the Lazar's disease. Isn't that what you would do, if you contracted a contagious disease? So Nyssa goes running around for the rest of the episode in her lacy underthings. Peri starts out in Planet Of Fire wearing a string bikini. (Couldn't she at least wear a one-piece bathing suit or one that covers just a bit more?) What will she leave wearing? Her clothes leave little to the imagination. Even Leela wore something a little less revealing.

If such action continues, where will the reputation of Doctor Who as a good, family, wholesome show go? Wasn't Doctor Who originally a children's show? Will children not be able to watch Doctor Who because of censorship?

What happened to the good show that William Hartnell, Patrick Troughton, Jon Pertwee, and Tom Baker designed?

What happened to treating people as people instead of as nationalities, stereotypes, and sex symbols?

SHOCKING

It could be that your 'Unsuitable for Children?' article in DWM 97 has come at an opportune moment.

After watching the first half of Vengeance on Varos, I can see a fresh wave of horror and violence complaints landing on the BBC's doormat.

It could be argued that the programme contained numerous scenes of sadistic cruelty and psychological violence, which might be harmful to younger viewers.

Before citing examples, I should say that I would not make any such judgements. I can't remember what frightened me as a child, so can't presume to say what frightens youngsters today. Nor, I would say, can any so-called experts, and the self-appointed Mary Whitehouse types certainly can't.

I may not be able to speak for kids, but I can report that my 23-year-old wife was shocked and stunned, as they say, and it was her reaction that sparked this letter.

So, back to the point. After Peter Davison's inoffensive run as the Doctor, this second story in Colin Baker's first full season came as something of a surprise.

The whole atmosphere on Varos is dark and oppressive (a compliment to the production team) and the opening scenes of the chained, bare-chested prisoner being burned by lasers was quite shocking.

Given that televised torture and execution is the staple diet of the populace, it could be argued that we are being invited to watch it with them, and there is certainly a topical connection with the current furore over 'video nasties' in our homes here in Earthbound lil' ol' England.

On top of this we have the sadistic glee of the Jabba the Hutt-like Sil as he watches the suffering, the possible execution of the Governor at the push of the voters' TV buttons and the mental torment of the hallucinating Doctor at the cliffhanger ending.

I loved it, of course, but looking at it from a complaining point of view, the phrase Barry Letts used in the 'Unsuitable for Children?' article about avoiding 'explicit cruelty' comes to mind. I think Vengeance on Varos could be said to include scenes of cold, deliberate and explicit cruelty.

Anyway, that's enough on the subject. I just wanted to make observations, not judgements. But I will be interested to see if any critics or Mary Whitehouse's media watchdogs pick up on this episode. I hope they do. I like a little controversy, it won't hurt Doctor Who and the complainers always make themselves look so ridiculous.

With all the emphasis in the last couple of years on the show's long run, Doctor Who had begun to look its age. Perhaps now, with the weighty 20th birthday celebrations well and truly over, the show can begin a new lease of life.

The one fly in the ointment is Peri Brown. Nicole Bryant's performance, faces along at a single pitch - hysterical! If she asked the Doctor if he wanted a cup of tea, it would begin as a whine, build to a scream and before it was over she would need rescuing from the clutches of the tea cosy.

Peri Brown negates all the progress in the characterisation of female companions made from the time of Sarah Jane Smith onwards. Sarah, Leela, Romana, Nyssa and Tegan could all get themselves out of the messes they got into. Could Peri?

Perhaps Nicola Bryant is not to blame, but someone is at fault, be it the scriptwriters, directors or John Nathan-Turner himself. Something must be done.

★ CYBER-TALK

A few impressions of this season's opening story. Unlike last season's starter Attack of the Cybermen was well paced with the action never allowed to slow for more than a few minutes. There was always something going on to keep the viewers' attention, as well as the introduction of a marvellous new alien race, the Cryons.

A very good script was evident with worthwhile dialogue for all concerned (except the Cybermen, but they are supposed to sound boring anyway), and a humorous element threaded throughout most of the two episodes which never overshadowed the drama of the story, which was again ably directed by Matthew Robinson and was equal to, if not better, than his Resurrection of the Daleks.

Just one small quibble. As many people have said before (but which newer viewers may never have heard), whatever happened to the Cybermen's voices? Up to The Invasion they were always chilling, metallic draws - totally inhuman. Now they sound like men in diver-helmets (I know that's what they are really but do they have to sound like it)? Why can't the electronic voices be brought back?

★ TIME AGAIN

I would like to clear up, once and for all, this nasty business concerning the Tom Baker flashback sequence in Earthshock. All of those people who say that Revenge of the Cybermen took place after Earthshock are wrong, even Jean-Marc Lofficier in his Programme Guide volume two.

To begin with, the TARDIS materialises on Nerva in The Ark in Space ten thousand years after the solar flares of 2900 A.D. When the Doctor is whisked off to Skaro for Genesis of the Daleks he is further back in time. Since the Daleks in The Dalek Invasion of Earth were more advanced than those in Genesis (i.e. they can move not just on metal as in The Dead Planet) and that the invasion took place in 2164 A.D., Genesis took place before 2164. Now, when returned to Nerva in Revenge, the Doctor moved in space but not in time, obviously since the TARDIS had to move back through time to get to him. And when Harry asked the Doctor if "when" they were was long before the time of the solar flares, the Doctor responded, "Thousands of years before..." (A little exaggeration there Doc, but nevertheless, to the point.)

Therefore Revenge of the Cybermen took place before 2164 and Earthshock in 2526. No problem. The Cybermen in Earthshock could easily have that picture of the Doctor's fourth incarnation.

CONTINUITY ATTACK

After watching Attack of the Cybermen I'd like to say what a remarkable story it was.

The story itself was superb, the sets realistic and the acting wonderful by all concerned, especially Colin Baker and Miss Bryant. The Cryons were one of the best new races for many years being strong, shy and sympathetic at the same time. Many people may wonder why three well-known and talented actresses should play the lead Cryons when they themselves are unrecognisable underneath when any actress could have played them. But I believe that it was the talent of these actresses (namely Miss Berger, Miss Greene and Miss Brown) that made the Cryons such a wonderful new race!

But it was for nostalgic reasons that I think this story will be best remembered. In its own way it could be a sequel to both Resurrection of the Daleks and The Tenth Planet from back in 1966. The continuity headaches involved must have been tremendous!

But for all this, there are a couple of items I'd like to complain about. Firstly, there seems to be a lack of continuity concerning the Doctor. In Attack he was seen to be suffering tremendously from the cold (even more than Peri), but back in The Seeds of Doom he stated to Sarah that Time Lords weren't effected by the cold. This was said when they were walking through the Antarctic wastes! Secondly, the Cybermen. Their speech seems to be deteriorating with each appearance. This time I could hardly understand a word they said! Also, they seem to be getting killed off very easily - even by ordinary guns! I thought they were indestructible (or almost!)

SEASON 22 – THE STARS

Whilst this current season is in full swing, just a few guest stars for what promises to be an explosive, if a little grave, end to the season in the shape of Revelation of the Daleks. Possibly one of the best assemblages of character actors possible come together here, starting off with one-time Champions star, William Gaunt as Otzai. Gaunt is best known these days in the BBC sit-com No Place Like Home. Another person normally associated with comedy is Eleanor Bron, playing Kara. Mrs Bron last appeared in a cameo role in City of Death, alongside John Cleese as the TARDIS-loving art experts. Alternative comedian and Young Ones landlord Alexei Sayle plays the DJ, and Clive Swift, currently starring in Barry Letts' BBC adaptation of The

Packwick Papers plays Jobel. One time Upstairs Downstairs and Crossroads star Jenny Tomasin plays Tasambeker, while Terry Molloy once again dons the mask of Davros, and District Nurse's John Ogwen plays Bostock. Hugh Walters, last seen as Runcible the Fatuous in The Deadly Assassin, plays Vogel and Stongos is played by Alec Instead, who has twice been in Doctor Who; firstly as the electronics expert Sgt Osmond in The Daemons and then as the evil Jellineq in Robot. Trevor Cooper and Colin Spaul are Takis and Lilf, with Stephen Flynn and Bridget Lynch-Blosse as Grigory and Natasha. Stuntman/actor Ken Barker steps in as the mutant, and completing the cast, old hands, Cy Town, John Scott Martin, Tony Starr and Toby Byrne, are the various Daleks. Royce Mills and Roy Skelton provide the Dalek's voices, which makes Roy Skelton the first actor to have worked with all six incarnations of the Doctor. ■

MICHAEL WISHER ON VIDEO

One of the most popular guests at Doctor Who conventions recently has been the multi-talented Michael Wisher, the actor most famous for bringing to life the first and best Davros in Genesis of the Daleks. Before long we hope to have an interview with Michael in this magazine, along with the other Davroses (Davrosit?), Terry Molloy and David Gooderson. For those of you who cannot wait, and wish to find out this amusing and experienced actor and his ten or so roles in Doctor Who, a professional, commercially available video tape is available from Reeltime Pictures Ltd. Drop a line and an SAE to Reeltime at 80, Montholme Road, Battersea, London SW11 6HY, and ask them for details. It retails at around £7 and is available on both VHS and Betamax. A must for all Doctor Who/Dalek fans. Other cassettes in the series include John Leeson, Nicholas Courtney and possibly a Doctor or two. This exciting new venture looks very promising and worth investigating. ■

QUOTE OF THE MONTH

Sadly this is the last 'Quote of the Month' we shall be presenting, and so I have chosen two quotes to finish with. Both are from the William Hartnell story The Savovites, and were submitted by reader Peter Rosser of Cardiff. My thanks to all those who have sent in quotes over the last fifteen months, they have been fun to read and print, and so here are Peter's. The first shows the Doctor at his most serious and pensive, the second at his silliest and jolliest.

"It all started out as a mild curiosity in a junkyard and now it has turned out to be quite a spirit of adventure".

"No, Barbara. I learnt not to meddle in other people's affairs years ago. Now, don't be absurd - there's not an ounce of curiosity in me!"

NEW BOOK

Available very shortly is a book by producer John Nathan-Turner. The book is published by Picaresque Press, and is entitled 'TARDIS inside Out'. Andrew Skilleter, the talented Target cover artist and creator of the range of Profile Prints, provides some line illustrations. Another definite must for fans.

NEW BBC VIDEO

Also on the video front is the latest in the BBC's releases of stories from the Tom Baker/Philip Hinchcliffe/Robert Holmes era of Doctor Who. Written by Robert Holmes from a story by Lewis Greffer, Pyramids of Mars ought to be in the shops by now. ■

GALLIFREY GUARDIAN

Gallifrey Guardian is dead, long live Gallifrey Guardian! This is the last edition of Gallifrey Guardian in this format. As from next month, issue 100 - which promises to be a fairly special issue in itself - Gallifrey Guardian is going ahead for three months out of every four. It will become a newspaper to keep readers all over the world informed in greater depth of what is happening in America, Canada and Australia. The first of the new style Gallifrey Guardians comes from America, and in issue 101 it will be Australia. The issue after it will be Canada and then back to Britain. Then it will be back to America in 104, Australia in 105 and so on. Every four issues we will say what is happening in the world of Doctor Who in the UK. We hope you enjoy this new insight into how non-British fans of the series are receiving the programme, what they are seeing, what changes may be made, what conventions are taking place and basically what Who-related matters are occurring. Next month John Peel will present Gallifrey Guardian from the United States of America. Be here!

FAN AID

Unless you were in hibernation over the yuletide period, you cannot have failed to have come across Band Aid, the assemblage of pop stars who made a record, proceeds from which went to the very worthwhile cause of famine relief in Ethiopia. Hot on their heels comes Fan Aid. This is the brainchild of long-time Doctor Who fans Paul Cornell and Miles Booy - their intention has been to produce a special fanzine - a Doctor Who magazine written by Doctor Who fans from all over the world. By now this special item of merchandise will be in production, and if you would like a copy (around the £1 mark) then drop a line to Paul, and ask for details. Remember, all proceeds are going to Ethiopia - the writers, the printers, etc. are donating their services for nothing. You can write to Paul at: Three Gables, The Hayle, Calstone, Nr. Calne, Wiltshire, or ring on Calne 813474.

THE SANDERS

SELECTION

Now a number of questions from a long list from M. Sanders of Brixham in Devon. His first question asks which stories have featured helicopters in them. Needless to say, a majority feature the gadget-ridden incarnation of the Doctor, the third, but Patrick Troughton's Doctor had his fair share. Firstly in Enemy Of The World, Astrid rescued the Doctor, Jamie and Victoria by helicopter. When the Doctor flew Jamie to a gas rig in Fury From The Deep he explains that he learnt to fly a helicopter whilst watching Astrid. Thirdly, UNIT rescued the Doctor (again) Jamie (again) and Isobel Watkins from the top of Tobias Vaughn's I.E. building in the recently novelised Invasion. UNIT were the main purveyors of helicopters during the Pertwee era. They combed Wenley Moor in one during Doctor Who And The Silurians, were attacked by one in Ambassadors Of Death, explored Stangmoor Prison in one during The Mind Of Evil and finally blew it up in The Daemons. Planet Of The Spiders saw the use of a new gyrocopter, a cross between a helicopter and a bicycle. Incidentally the scene of helicopters being blown up in Enemy Of The World and The Daemons were both scenes 'borrowed' from the United Artists James Bond movie From Russia With Love.

MATRIX

Databank

M. Sanders' next question is actually a request for a list of times the programme has had a photograph on the front of The Radio Times, the BBC's listings magazine. Marco Polo was the first and only Hartnell cover. Troughton stories featured twice, Power Of The Daleks and Tomb Of The Cybermen. Every Jon Pertwee season opened with a cover – Spearhead From Space, Terror Of The Autons, Day Of The Daleks (featuring the late Frank Bellamy's flawless artwork), The Three Doctors and The Time Warriors. It wasn't until November 1983 that Doctor Who made front cover news – this time for The Five Doctors.

Lastly, M. Sanders has two quickies – were Nicholas Courtney's moustache and Anthony Ainley's beard and moustache false, and did Spearhead From Space feature the War Games regeneration scene. No to the latter. Anthony Ainley has worn a false beard and moustache in all his Doctor Who roles, and Nicholas Courtney's moustache made it's one and only appearance during The Five Doctors. ★

IN FRONT OF THE CAMERA

Yet another list, this time for Denis Harrison of Sheffield who asks what production team members have ever appeared in the series. Well, recently, Producer John Nathan Turner turned up as a passerby in Arc Of Infinity, and assistant floor manager Val McCrimmon was a strooper on board the freighter in Earthshock. Composer Dudley Simpson played the Music Hall conductor in Temps Of Weng-Chiang, whilst one-arms script editor Victor Pemberton fared up on The Moonbase, and writer of The Space Museum, Glyn Jones, played Kranz in The Sentient Experiment. Perhaps the most famous sequence of all that featured production staff was the Brain Of Morbius segment where the faces of Morbius flashed up on the screen. These were played by: George Galacio (Production Unit Manager), Christopher Berry (director), Douglas Camfield (director), Philip Mitchell (Producer), Chris Banks (Floor Manager) and Robert Holmes (script editor). Anyone who has the BBC Video of Brain Of Morbius will in fact notice that there are nine faces but only six people listed above, I will endeavour to find out who the other three are, but an interesting point is that both the first face and the bust of Morbius that Dr Solon owns are similar. At a guess it appears to be the late actor Michael Spice who portrayed the voice of Morbius.

THE GALLIFREYAN HIERARCHY

Richard J. Smith of Leeds asks about the Time Lords. Over the last few years we have seen that the various Gallifreyan councils are made up of a Lord President, a Chancellor, Cardinals, Councillors and a Castellan. Richard asks what they all are. Well, the President is, as you might guess, the President. He immediately succeeds in command to a Chancellor, like Goth in The Deadly Assassin. Then there are the Cardinals, theoretically three of them, the leader of each Time Lord chapter – the Prydonians (like Borusa), the Acolytes and the Patres. The rest of the Council is made up of various experienced Time Lords called Councillors. The Castellan is not actually a member of the Council as he is not a Time Lord but just a Gallifreyan who organises the Chancellor's Guard. However, the Castellan is a valued member of society, as he is the one person who successfully straddles both sides of the classes on Gallifrey.

ALTERNATIVE TITLES AND PHOTO FIND

Many more thanks to those of came The Crusade. you who have put pen to paper to enlighten us about some more alternative titles to stories. The Loch Ness Monster became Terror Of The Zygons, The White Savages became The Savages, Out Of Invasion where two of Stygon's Labyrinth is another title for Carnival Of Monsters, tying the Doctor to the bomb-laden cenotaph.

K.R. Wheeler of Ringwood, wonders where the photograph on page 8 of the Doctor Who Monster Book number Two comes from. It is from the Tom Baker story The Android where two of Stygon's android mechanics are, tying the Doctor to the bomb-laden cenotaph.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ THE WEAPONS OF CYBER ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

D. A. Thompson (what is wrong with people who won't put their first names?) asks for a list as well. This time, a list of Cyber-weaponry. Apart from spaceships and bombs, Cyber-weaponry is usually personal. In The Tenth Planet, Cybermen had two sorts of firepower. Firstly the rather cumbersome tray-sized guns and a flash of light from their head devices used to stun General Cutler. In The Moonbase and Tomb Of The Cybermen they used short rod-like guns, although a huge cannon was also situated on the moon's surface in the former. Wheel In Space saw the headpiece being used again, this time to hypnotise and communicate with humans. They also carried guns and fired, or rather glowed light, from their chest units. In the case of the chest unit, the victim glowed negative, rather like the old Dalek killing method. The Invasion retained the chest glow, and updated the rod-guns into a more conventional

'ray gun' image seen in awful fifties SF movies. In Revenge Of The Cybermen they fired laser blasts from the headpiece, activated by pressing the chest unit, and in Earthshock, The Five Doctors and Attack Of The Cybermen they used the chunky rifle blasters. One of those blasters was, would you believe, chopped in half, stuck upright and used by the Silurians in the battle cruiser in Warriors Of The Deep last season.

Recently a slight reshuffle occurred within the corridors of W. H. Allen, the publishers of the popular range of Target paperback Doctor Who novels. Whilst Christina Donaghue remains overall editor of Target, Nigel Robinson has become editor of the Doctor Who range. Nigel has been working freelance for the company in proofreading and editing for the last eighteen months but officially became editor of the books last autumn. He originally approached W. H. Allen with the idea of a Tolkien Quiz Book based around the Lord of the Rings books. Then, during discussions with the editorial director he came up with the idea of a Doctor Who Quiz Book which was published in 1981. The following year saw the Doctor Who Crossword Book, and then in 1983 The Second Doctor Who Quiz Book.

*GARY RUSSELL: What exactly does the job as Doctor Who editor entail?

*NIGEL ROBINSON: My job first starts with the commissioning of novels. We normally go straight to the script writer, who usually wants to write the novel. After we've agreed terms, and got clearance from the BBC, the writer then goes and writes his novel. After that we receive the manuscript. I get the manuscript into some sort of shape for the printer and correct any mistakes in style, although there aren't very many with Doctor Who writers. After it's been to the printers, we receive a set of proofs which we check for accuracy and after that we send it back to the printers with all the corrections and then the book is eventually bound and comes out as you see it on the shelf. It can be any amount of time between a commission and a book hitting the shelves, but the usual time with most books is nine months, although I believe that An Unearthly Child was just four months. But the average time is eight to nine months.

*Recent years have seen more of the original writers doing their own books. What has been the reason for that?

☆I think the original writers have become more aware of the popularity of Doctor Who and certainly, if I was an original script-writer, I'd want to write my own novelisation. Also I think it's quite a good idea to get the original writer to do his own book because he understands the story probably better than anyone else. The best example of that is The Myth Makers by Donald Cotton. No one, no matter how good they are, could have written The Myth Makers as well as Donald Cotton.

GARY RUSSELL

*What if the original writer isn't available, is that where Terrance Dicks and Ian Marter come in? And how do you decide who will write which books?

☆It depends on the writer's style and interest. I know for a fact that Terrance Dicks is very interested in Brian Hayles' and Malcolm Hulke's work, so if we have a Hulke or Hayles script, we'd probably approach Terrance. Ian is more adept at scripts of other writers. It also depends on their availability.

*What other things do you manage apart from editing the books?

☆I write copy for the back of the book. I will help decide what books will go into the boxed sets. I also write publicity material that goes to all the bookshops. Publicity material is for the shops, telling them about the book, the author and persuading the bookseller to buy the book. Whilst the Doctor Who list has a hardcore of readers, there are always more to attract. And the more Doctor Who books a bookshop has on its shelves, the more Doctor Who books it sells.

*Who decides which books are to be published, and with such a demanding schedule, is it difficult releasing one novel per month?

☆The choice of novels is essentially mine—what I'd like to do eventually is have the output split half and half—half current stories, half older ones. And yes, it is an extremely difficult task releasing books with such regularity. It is quite rare, and you find that the companies that do put out one book per month in a series very often turn out shoddy products. I think our Doctor Who books are of a very high standard, even though we put them out monthly. This is partly because we use different writers, but mostly because we all take a great amount of care with the Doctor Who books, from my position as editor, through the writers, right up to the art department and to our salesmen. It is a very big part of W. H. Allen, a very important part and we pay a lot of attention to it.

*Many readers of Doctor Who Magazine have commented on the fact that the page count has grown somewhat over the last year. The thin 127-page books have now been replaced by the more enjoyable 144 pages. Taking that a stage further, is there a possibility of novelising either Mission to the Unknown, the show's only one-part story, or The Daleks' Master Plan, the show's longest at 12 episodes? How would they fit into the 144-page count?

☆If we did The Daleks' Master Plan it would be with Mission to the Unknown. Yes, all thirteen episodes in one volume, and certainly I think the page count would be larger. I think a story in a novel should be as complete as possible. I'm not in favour of large cuts from the original scripts, although occasionally it may be necessary to do that.

*Finally, what do you feel about the letters that W. H. Allen receive concerning the books?

☆I welcome all the suggestions, criticisms and hopefully compliments that people send me. I welcome criticism so long as it is constructive. I also expect people to be aware that we work with certain literary and commercial restrictions. We can't do everything that everyone wants... straight away!

W. H. Allen are hopefully to produce another Peter Haining book for 1986 and, as with The Key To Time, Nigel would welcome your artwork for inclusion in the book. All illustrations should be on white unlined 10" x 8" paper or thin card, with your name and address on the back. To ensure the return of your work you must enclose a properly sized stamped addressed envelope. Now all you have to do is draw away and send your masterpiece to Nigel Robinson, W. H. Allen, 44 Hill Street, London, W1, to arrive no later than 31st May 1985. Nigel has kindly supplied me with an updated provisional hardback release schedule which is as follows: April '85: The Myth Makers (D. Cotton). May: Doctor Who Cookbook (G. Downie). The Invasion (I. Marter). Jun: The Kratons (T. Dicks). July: The Two Doctors (R. Holmes) — the 100th Target book. Aug: The Time Monster (T. Dicks). Sep: Illustrated A-Z (L. Stranding). The Twin Dilemma (E. Seward). Oct: The Gunfighters (D. Cotton). Other books due shortly after include Gerry Davis' Celestial Toymaker, Philip Martin's Vengeance on Varos, Ian Stuart Black's The Savages, Pip and Jane Baker's Mark of the Rani and Bill Emms' Galaxy 4. Two more non-fiction books are Peter Haining's new one, and Doctor Who — The Early Years by our own Jeremy Bentham. Well done, Jeremy!

The
con

The annual Chicago Convention is now regarded as the Doctor Who event of the year, and last year's was no exception. "The anniversary reunion of the Doctors in season 21" brought together Patrick Troughton, Jon Pertwee, Peter Davison and Colin Baker for three days of festivities at the Hyatt Regency - O'Hare. Spirit of Light's celebration held from November 23-25, 1984, also brought back many other stars such as John Nathan-Turner, Terrance Dicks, Janet Fielding, Anthony Ainley and Nicola Bryant and featured some new faces including Lis Sladen and Fraser Hines.

Overall, the convention seemed to run more smoothly than it did in 1983. Norman Rubenstein of Spirit of Light attributed this to better organisation and lower attendances. As with previous conventions, the participants seemed to enjoy themselves as much, if not more than, the fans, and with that kind of response the success of future conventions seems assured.

STONE

The Doctor, in his fourth incarnation, and Romana return to Earth to search for the third segment of the Key to Time. Their quest, and their lives, become endangered when they are caught up in a web of ancient intrigue, as all is not what it seems in The Stones of Blood...

EPISODE ONE

In the TARDIS, Romana fits together the first two segments of the Key to Time. The Doctor, having dismissed that task as too simple, ascertains their next destination: one where strange pagan ceremonies take place at night, where sinister, white-robed figures with burning torches assemble at a four-thousand-year-old stone circle beneath a full moon to conduct their terrifying blood sacrifices – Earth!

After materialising, the Doctor and Romana leave K-9 on guard in the TARDIS and set out on their mission, to find the third segment of the key. They find themselves in a meadow, where the Doctor is puzzled to discover some unusual indentations in the ground, indicating the trail of something very heavy. They soon come to a stone circle, where the Tracer mysteriously loses contact with its target.

At the site they encounter two women conducting a topographical, geological, astronomical and archeological survey of the site. The stone circle is known to the women – the aged but sprightly Emilla Rumford and the seemingly younger Vivien Fey, as the 'Nine Travellers'. The Doctor is surprised to discover dried blood on the ground, which Miss Fey explains is from the British Institute of Druidic Studies' regular sacrifices on this site. She dismisses them as a group of unhistorical cranks, but Professor Rumford confesses that they worry her. Professor Rumford particularly dislikes their leader, a Mr Leonard de Vries, whom the Doctor decides to look up. Leaving Romana with the two women, he voices his suspicions of them before he leaves.

Arriving at the Hall, de Vries' expansive ebode, the Doctor finds himself an expected guest. He is intrigued by the spears on a wall where several portraits once hung, and also by the Raven perched in the living room, which de Vries insists is not a pet. De Vries deduces from their conversation that his guest knows too much, and he leads the Doctor to a door where a strange figure in a bird-like face mask and feathered robes appears. As the Doctor approaches this weird apparition, he is brutally coshed from behind.

Meanwhile Professor Rumford and Miss Fey have left Romana, who is awaiting the Doctor's return. Hearing what she believes to be his voice, she is led to a cliff-edge overlooking the sea. Someone pushes her from behind, and she falls from the edge with a piercing scream.

EPISODE TWO

The Doctor awakes to find himself in the stone circle, about to be sacrificed to the druid goddess, the Ceilleach, by de Vries and his followers. Fortunately, Professor Rumford arrives just in time panicking the robed figures into flight. The Doctor is worried about Romana, and becomes more so when he discovers her shoes lying in the grass. He summons K-9 with an ultrasonic whistle and together they track her to the cliff-edge, where they see her below clinging desperately to the rock face. Believing her attacker to be the rock face, she is reluctant to accept his help, but his protestations and K-9's assurances finally restore her confidence. She then realises that her attacker must have been somebody in possession of the third segment of the Key to Time, and was using its chameleon powers to deceive her. The three return to the circle, where the Tracer now registers the presence of the third segment. They again meet the Professor and Miss Fey, and the Doctor decides to pay another visit to Mr de Vries.

As the Doctor and K-9 approach the house they hear sounds of destruction and terrible screams. Upon entering, they find the place in ruins and two dead bodies. Suddenly an orange glow lights everything, a thumping pulse ebbsters the silence, and a massive obelisk bursts into the room – it is one of the stones from the circle. A door crashes down over the Doctor, whilst K-9 uses all his resources to blast the stone creature which retreats at last.

At Miss Fey's cottage Romana is going through Professor Rumford's notes on the circle, and discovers that the land on which the stones stand has always been owned by a woman, until the advent of Mr de Vries, back to the twelfth century when a convent stood on the site. Romana goes over to the Hall with Professor Rumford, which was built on the site of the convent, to see if any of the old convent records still exist.

At the Hall they find the Doctor at work on the badly damaged K-9 and Romana suggests using the molecular stabiliser from the TARDIS to save him. Before she leaves, the Doctor tells her that the bodies are globulin deficient and the creature that attacked them lives on blood.

He and the Professor begin to search the Hall, and soon the Doctor discovers a hidden door leading into a Priest's Hole. Inside he finds the three paintings, dating back hundreds of years, missing from the wall. All the paintings have something in common – each has the features of Miss Fey, under differing guises.

Having completed repairs on K-9, Romana comes out of the TARDIS. She doesn't notice the two crows, the eyes and ears of Ceilleach, perched on the roof of the Ship, but she does see an eerie glow around the circle through the darkness. As she investigates, Miss Fey emerges from the bushes and pushes her into the centre of the circle. She points a glittering wand at her, and Romana fades from view.

EPISODE THREE

As the Doctor is explaining to Professor Rumford that Vivien Fey is the Ceilleach, one of the stone creatures arrives and they both flee. It appears they are trapped when they reach the cliff's edge, but the Doctor manages to confuse the creature and it plunges into the sea. They return to the circle where they find Vivien, who bids them beware the Dgrí – the stone creatures – and then dematerialises.

Back at the cottage, the Doctor constructs an unusual contraption which he powers with some salt crystals which the Professor has found for him. He explains that Miss Fey and Romana are in hyperspace – the fourth dimension, described as 'a theoretical absurdity' – and he hopes to reach them using his machine. After one unsuccessful attempt, the Doctor dematerialises from the centre of the stone circle. As he fades within a swirling blue wind, the two remaining ogris slide into view and K-9 turns on them with his blaster.

The Doctor appears in a gleaming corridor aboard a craft that can traverse hyperspace, and releases Romana from one of the many security cells. The occupants of the other compartments, some of which are familiar to the Doctor, all appear to be dead. The two Time Lords make their way to the control room, where the Doctor operates a scanner to show Romana their whereabouts. The scanner depicts a diagram of the craft just above the circle.

The Doctor and Romana return to examine the cells. They discover what appears to be a 'first class' compartment, from which two pulsating, hovering points of light emerge, introducing themselves curtly as the Megers, the justice bio-machines. The Doctor has broken the law by breaking the seals, and they must face prosecution. One of the machines decides to defend the accused, and the other is to be the judge. Whilst they are arguing the case for and against him, the Doctor and Romana slip quietly away.

K-9 fends off the attacking stone creatures, and he and the Professor continue their vigil. When K-9 suggests that the creatures have gone to recharge, the Professor is horrified by the thought that to do so they will need more blood... for which they will have to kill.

The two enormous stone creatures stand, apparently lifeless, before a torchlit tent. The two occupants believe them to be some sort of hawk, and one of them tentatively touches one of the stones. At once it begins to glow, drawing the blood from her body and, when the other camper tries to free her, the same fate befalls him. The silence of the night is pierced by their agonised screams.

ES of blood

Miss Fay materialises in the circle before the Professor and K-9, and callously destroys their machine, leaving the Doctor and Romana stranded without hope of rescue. Once she has done so, she returns once more to hyperspace, summoning the Ogri.

The time travellers wait for the machine to return them to Earth. However, nothing happens until Miss Fay materialises with the two Ogri, exultantly announcing that she has destroyed their machine: they are trapped in hyperspace forever.

EPISODE FOUR

As the Ogri approach, the Megara arrives and intervenes. The three humanoids are led to the control rooms where the Doctor is sentenced to death for removing the seals. He requests an appeal and his execution is delayed.

The Doctor calls his first witness, Romana, who, under the Megara's truth assessor, recounts the events from her rescue to the opening of the seals. His second witness is a reluctant Miss Fay, who immediately summons the Ogri. The Megara destroys one with a beam of light. Romana leaves the room, followed by the remaining Ogri and, since K-9 and the Professor have finely managed to effect repairs on the machine, they are transported back to Earth. Hoping to elude their pursuer, Romana, Professor Rumford and K-9 head back to the cottage.

Miss Fay submits to the truth assessor. The Doctor tells the Megara to ask her what her name is, but he is over-ruled. Thinking desperately, he comes up with one final card and plays it. He calls the Megara as witnesses. Reluctantly they agree, and they tell him that they were travelling to Diplos, a G-class planet in Tau Ceti, to try Cesseir of Diplos, a female humanoid criminal accused of murder and the theft of the Great Seal of Diplos, which the Doctor realises must be the third segment.

Conducting a seemingly fruitless search of Miss Fay's cottage, Romana comes across a cookery book in which all recipes that include the ingredient citric acid have been deleted. The Professor confirms that Miss Fay is allergic to foods with an acidic content, and true Romana deduces that her home planet has to be a G-class planet in Tau Ceti - the same system in which the Ogri originated. Just at this instant the remaining Ogri finally reaches the cottage, and bursts into the kitchen. The three friends retire to the circle with the machine, followed closely by the stone creature at the circle Romana hurriedly compiles her evidence against Miss Fay.

The Doctor's long overdue sentence is about to be carried out. There is a flash and he and Miss Fay fall senseless. The Doctor has short-circuited the Megara's power, and now that she is unconscious they concede to reading Miss Fay's memory cells, which they could not legally do whilst she was conscious. They discover her real identity, and when Romana bursts in breathlessly with her evidence, she finds that the matter has been satisfactorily resolved without her help.

The Megara, Cesseir, the Doctor and Romana return to Earth and the Doctor snatches the necklace from around his adversary's neck in triumph and the sentence is carried out. Miss Fay is turned to stone and the Megara vanishes.

Having said farewell to Professor Rumford, the Doctor and Romana transform the necklace into the third segment of the Key to Time, and the Doctor puzzles over the way it fits together with the other two...

of blood

David Fisher's first teleplay for Doctor Who, The Stones of Blood, was recorded in the summer of 1978 entirely on video tape, a measure adopted to avoid the characteristic jump often witnessed in shows that mix film and tape. At the helm of the production was director Darrol Blake, whose previous credits included episodes of Doomwatch, The Regiment and Emmerdale Farm. For his cast he chose the popular character actress Beatrix Lehman as Professor Rumford, sadly one of her last roles. As Vivien Fay, Blake opted for Susan Engel, while the suave Nicholas McArdle portrayed de Vries. Elaine Ives-Cameron played Martha, and James Murray and Shirin Taylor were the unfortunate campers.

The Stone Ogrs were actually made of fibre glass, internally lit and allowed some movement through casters fixed on their bases. For the scene where the girl camper's head is turned into its skeletal form, a close up of the girl's living head was recorded by visual effects designer Mat Irvine tracing its outline on the monitor screen, and then matching the head with its model replacement. When recorded and run together, the two shots appeared to show the head being drained and reduced to its skeletal original.

MOOTED 100TH PARTY

The Stones of Blood was the series' much vaunted hundredth story, and in keeping with this, a celebratory scene was written and rehearsed until, in the studio, producer Graham Williams decided it was too obvious and self-congratulatory. The scene would have taken place inside the TARDIS with an adjoining 'limbo' set, wherein would be found a fridge, table and all the traditional birthday celebration trimmings.

On location, the day for night process for shooting was used to great effect with all the night scenes actually recorded in full daylight, but with a filter fitted to the camera, producing the illusion of darkness. Stock footage was employed to show the rocks supposedly beneath the small ledge onto which Romana falls. For the fall itself a stunt double was employed to stand in for Mary Tamm. Problems were experienced on location with the medallion around Susan Engel's neck, designed with a release catch to enable Tom Baker to pull it from her neck. Unfortunately, the mechanism jammed and Baker was left tugging at poor Susan Engel's neck.

LIGHT THROUGH SOUND

The strange and singularly striking light effects employed for the Megara were linked to the microphones used by actors Gerald Cross and David McAlister. As they spoke, the lights would flash in response. Thus for several shots, the actors were directed to produce a series of nonsense noises to attain the right visual appearance for the Megara. Gerald Cross actually provided the voice of the White Guardian heard at the beginning of the story, recording the few lines on what is called a wild track - sound only. For a part of the action set on the space ship, the boom microphone couldn't follow Tom Baker and Mary Tamm to pick up their lines because of the way the set had been constructed. As a result the scene was taped without sound and later dubbed in in the editing stages.

Material re-used in this story including props from The Android Invasion and a 'rotting' Wirm creature from The Ark in Space as one of the ship's prisoners. There was some difficulty in getting the cell door to open properly and then stay shut. Firstly it was suggested that Tom Baker held a piece of string to keep the door in position, but eventually the production manager solved the problem by stepping in herself. Designer John Stout was on hand to help with difficulties like this and the complications of recreating part of the stone circle seen on location back in the studio. And although within the studio K9 worked smoothly, for the exterior shots some time was spent in trying to get him to function on the ground.

VIDEO ILLUSIONS

Recording was, as ever, dominated by the typical Doctor Who requirements of special and video effects. For the shot where the Doctor is seen to look out of the space ship's windows, a method of picture composition was put into operation, reducing in apparent size the window with Tom Baker next to the ship's exterior. To obtain the appearance of the starfields outside the ship's windows, reflective boards and very careful lighting were combined to produce the realistic final look. Recording breaks had to be allowed for Susan Engel's complicated change of costume and make-up. Another delay was experienced when it was realised Tom Baker had to enact a fall without the help of a stunt man.

The final evening's recording was entirely devoted to work on special effects that didn't require the presence of actors, a rare luxury for the programme, and it was utilised to produce all of the modal shots (often made on film), including the sequence of the TARDIS spinning through time and space. The BBC also made use of a new piece of computer graphics, which had been extremely expensive to purchase, and which the Corporation rapidly pressed into use in other programmes including the rival space opera Blake's Seven.

Script editor Anthony Reed attributes the story's great popularity among fans to its three main elements - black magic, the Megara and the intriguingly glamorous central villain. The screenplay was novelised for Target Books by Terrance Dicks, while the incidental music for the show hailed from the well-known Dudley Simpson.

A good series entry in the epic Key To Time season, The Stones of Blood may be dangerously close to high camp but it also manages to be tightly plotted, well acted and occasionally suspenseful. ★

THE STONES OF BLOOD

INTERVIEW

MARY TAMM

Mary Tamm delighted Doctor Who viewers with her portrayal of the first incarnation of Romana, the Doctor's Time Lady companion. She reminisces with Richard Marson about her year on the series.

From as early as she can remember, Mary Tamm's driving ambition in life was always to act. Setting out to achieve her goal, Mary auditioned for and was accepted by the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art: "One of my contemporaries there was none other than Louise Jameson who, of course, was my predecessor in the series. I think she stayed longer than me, but when we met up again she said exactly the same things about the attention one attracts as a Doctor Who girl. It really does amaze me, I mean it's six years ago now and I'm still doing these interviews and conventions. Recently I was on tour with a play and I got so many requests for interviews I decided I would have to say no to them all rather than do some and refuse others."

Mary's entry into the programme was somewhat unusual in that she didn't specifically aim for the role of Romana, but was asked to audition for the part: "I wasn't particularly keen on going for it, but my agent suggested it would be a good career move. The producer Graham Williams and my first director George Spenton-Foster saw me and I was told it was planned to be something of a radical departure from the usual companion mould, with Romana matching up much more to the Doctor's intelligence and skill. It was supposedly going to be more of a challenge as well as more of a starring partnership. Anyway, I read for it and then Graham and George screen tested six actresses for the part before they contacted me and asked me to play Romana."

I wondered if Mary had felt any empathy with the character of Romana. "No, not really. I tend to get chosen for a lot of the parts I play because of the way I speak and look but I didn't have much in common with Romana. The interest for me, the actress, is in playing something that's different from me. What I did enjoy about playing her was, for some of the time at least, she stood up to the Doctor and did something on her own accord."

As soon as she was presented to the press as the new Doctor Who girl, Mary was subjected to the full glare of public interest: "The press are so funny. One of them reported me as saying that playing a Who girl was like being a James Bond girl, which I never said at all. I suppose there is an element of truth in it, but I never said it! They'll pick up anything that smells of behind-the-scenes tension and blow it

DIFFICULT DEBUT

Mary made her debut in the series with Robert Holmes' whimsical four-parter, The Ribos Operation, a story she doesn't remember with a great deal of affection: "I didn't really like the script on that one. For a start I thought 'hold on, what's happened to this incredible starring part' and then I realised that I was there to fill the traditional role of cipher to the Doctor. I still had to do my share of the screaming and the bungling that tends to go with being a companion. Looking back, the Doctor Who format doesn't actually allow for much else. It's only a half hour show. I did enjoy the year I had with show, but it was a bit of a disappointment once I realised about the character I was playing.

"I wasn't mad about the story itself, although I hadn't much to go on as it was only the first of the season. We had to work quite hard on it to get it to work and that is sometimes a frustrating business. It was the same on my last one too—The Armageddon Factor. I didn't think the plot was right for the length ▶ we were doing, and it was perhaps over-ambitious. To try and do too much in a series with the limits Doctor Who has to observe, can spoil the end effect. Maybe by the end of a season we'd run out of money!"

One of the highlights of the role, according to Mary, was the work she did with Tom Baker: "Tom's a fascinating man in many ways and very refreshing to work with, if occasionally a bit difficult. He was just so different, he suited the part down to the ground and in a rehearsal room he made everyone feel 'this is my show'. We got on very well, which was nice because, as with everything an actor does, that first few days of rehearsal can be really nerve-racking. He made me feel welcome quickly and so we got down to the work without any real hassles."

Talking about Tom reminded Mary of one amusing incident that occurred during the location filming on The Androids of Tara: "We had to do this scene using an antique fishing rod worth literally hundreds of pounds. Tom was supposed to be casting it off, which, when he came to the take he did – throwing the thing into the water at the same time. It was awful really, he felt so guilty, but it was very funny at the time." The Androids of Tara was partly filmed at Leeds Castle in Kent, a location Mary found especially enjoyable: "I was quite lucky with locations actually. That one was one of the nicest and certainly one of the quietest! The worst filming experiences I had were when we did The Power of Krill in a dreadful marsh somewhere. Tom and I got totally stuck in the mud, we just couldn't move until we were rescued. We were miles from anywhere and it was so bleak. There was absolutely nothing to do between takes, because if you wandered off you'd probably have been swallowed up!"

Mary's second story, The Pirate Planet, was not only one of her favourite scripts but was also

I think there's a lot of room for comedy in Doctor Who. If it concentrates too much on the frightening and more serious aspects of the situation it can become far too tense.

directed by her favourite director, Pennant Roberts: "That was written by Douglas Adams and it was great fun to work on. I really enjoyed its inventiveness and humour, and the whole production glowed. Pennant was my favourite director, yes, but that's not meant as a slight on the others. They were all fine, but Pennant was something special, and he was wonderful on that story. As a whole, we didn't have any difficult directors which, in a schedule like that, was a distinct blessing."

GREATER HUMOUR

Mary was very much in favour of the programme's humour being played to the fore. It was something that characterised the era of the series in which she worked: "Yes, I liked that element very much indeed. In fact, Tom and I put a lot of comedy into our relationship which I think worked quite well and was certainly very popular at the time. I think there's room for a lot of comedy in Doctor Who. If it concentrates too much on the frightening and more serious aspects of the situation it can become far too intense. The humour was a nice contrast to that and we tried hard to work it into the scripts wherever possible."

A major feature of Mary's year with Doctor Who was the love/hate relationship portrayed so amusingly onscreen between Romana and the Doctor. At its best it almost equalled the famous theatrical bitching of Noel Coward and Gertrude Lawrence: "That was something else I was very keen on and both Tom and I would have liked to have seen that develop even more than it did. I think though, that both our producers and our writers were a bit scared of going any further into that set-up because it was deviating from the established and successful formula. It was a shame but it's typical of the limits of TV."

Mary does, however, have fond memories of an experiment that did work – the metallic dog, K9: "John Leeson was just as inventive as Tom and he was super to be with in rehearsal. He did everything as if he actually was the dog we had on screen, down to wagging an imaginary tail! The character of K9 took off with viewers very rapidly and I think it's easy to see why. I liked him, but one did have to suspend one's disbelief when acting with him." Mary doesn't think K9 detracted from her character unduly and so she didn't resent his place in the TARDIS: "K9 was fine because he was usually on Romana's side in an argument as well as the fact that, because of the sheer mechanics of working him, he wasn't in every episode."

The Stones of Blood, shown as the hundredth Doctor Who story, was another of the adventures enjoyed by Mary: "Again we had some nice location stuff to do and I was rather impressed with the story. It was quite creepy. Because the cast was so small and so good, I got a larger part and it was a closer team. Susie Engel and I got on very well indeed and Beatrix Lehman was a tremendous person to work with." Mention of the excellent cast on The Stones of Blood brought Mary onto the subject of the rest of the guest casts she worked with: "We were incredibly fortunate in some of the casts we had. We got some big names like Iain Cuthbertson, Peter Jeffrey, Simon Lack and lovely Philip Madoc, who was particularly nice to work with on The Power of Krill. That gave it all a pleasant atmosphere and it gave the programme that extra touch of class too."

Another David Fisher script, The Androids of Tara, was one which Mary remembers rather better than most, for one very good reason: "That was the one where I got to play two parts, which was fine in one sense but which meant that I had more than the usual number of lines to learn! It was a nice idea and it offered me a bit of the scope I had been promised by the part, and which had been somewhat lost along the way. There was a scene in The Androids of Tara where I was being crowned or something, and I had this great big speech, something of a rarity in Doctor Who! I had a really heavy crown and my costume was so complex that even the slightest sharp movement would descend into disarray. On the first take I had just about got to the end of this long speech when I forgot the last line. I was furious and we had to start all over again. On the second take I lost my balance and the crown went cascading off my head. Everyone – including myself – absolutely fell about.”

Mary rarely watched her own performances in Doctor Who, explaining “I’m not a telly person, I’ve never watched much of anything and I rarely, if ever, watch my own stuff. I didn’t watch Doctor Who at all before I joined it and I’ve only watched it since because my little daughter loves the series and forces me to videotape it. As a result she wants it on classic serial of The Girls of Slender Means. I did a part in the film version of Whatever Happened To The Likely Lads? and in The Odessa File. Those, plus less suspicious roles in shows like Coronation Street, meant that at least my career wasn’t ruined by playing Romana. Some of the earlier girls’ careers were really washed up after doing Doctor Who. Since I left there’s been just as much work, thank goodness, including the TV series of Jane Eyre in which most of my part ended up on the cutting room floor and a stint in the West End production of Agatha Christie’s Cards On The Table. Last year I was in a new BBC comedy series called The Hello Goodbye Man, which had been one of my ambitions, and which I’m hoping will make its second series this year.”

SUCCESS AND SURPRISE

The programme’s great success with fans is an area Mary is both surprised and reserved about: “I knew what I was getting myself into before I joined the series, and so I wasn’t surprised about the interest from British fans, but what did knock me was the interest from the States. I just cannot understand the extent of the programme’s appeal. I just couldn’t sit down and watch the same shows again and again, which is what the American fans do, because the network over there just goes on showing them one after another. It’s incredible. I don’t resent it, but I do sometimes wish people would remember me for some of the other work I’ve done. My recollection of Doctor Who is getting understandably vaguer with time and the questions are often the same. For example, I’m always being asked to remember ▶

... I get very easily bored doing one thing for too long. A year is about my maximum in any job. I'm lucky in that I'd done a lot before Doctor Who and a lot since.

again and again, which I suppose, is something of a case of divine retribution.” She is not an actress who expresses a clear preference between any of the three media in which she has worked; film, television and theatre. “I like, if possible, to do something of each, because I get very easily bored doing one thing for too long. A year is about my maximum in any job. I’m lucky in that I’d done a lot before Doctor Who and a lot since.”

I asked Mary for the highlights of her career: “I did a television series called The Donati Conspiracy in the early 1970’s which I enjoyed a lot and also a BBC funny moments and it sounds so dull to say I can't but they've mostly gone now. Yes we did have a lot of laughs, but one does in any job where one enjoys a good relationship with one's workmates."

Nevertheless, Mary does profess to enjoy the massive conventions held in the States and she's hoping to attend more over the course of this coming year. She says the popularity of her role amazes her, considering she was with the programme for just the one year. Her fan mail hasn't stopped coming in: "It's actually becoming a real problem. I get thousands, and I really can't sit down and answer them all in turn, because there just isn't enough time in the day. Also, I inevitably get requests for signed photographs, which, as my supply of official ones has long since dried out, means I have to root about for my spare ones. I'm hoping I might get some more but until then they are in very short supply." Mary admits that she finds it hard to sum up the show's success: "I suppose it's the fantasy element that catches people's imaginations. It's been going on so long now I can't see it stopping. I see it as a children's programme that all ages can enjoy. It's not got the sort of violence that offends. It's nowhere near the level of a lot of imported American shows that children watch, and I think it can be considerably more inventive."

Returning to the programme itself, had Mary liked the idea of the 'Key To Time' season (six stories all with a running theme)? "I didn't really think about it like that. I mean, it was another idea to be tried out and I gather it was pretty successful. I only looked at each script as they came in from an actresses' point of view."

Part of the visual flavour of Mary's year with Doctor Who was her variety of wardrobe and its distinctly glamorous image: "It went with the character, didn't it? They gave me quite a lot of say in my costumes, so I used to talk to the costume designer before anything was decided. I've always loved dressing up and Romana was a lovely opportunity for me to indulge in that."

TOUGH SCHEDULES

Mary found the work on the series rewarding, occasionally frustrating, and without doubt exhausting: "It was a ten day turnaround so we were never off the treadmill for long. I found it very tiring indeed and I discovered my social life disappearing very quickly. I needed the time I got off simply to rest, otherwise I'd have been totally glassy-eyed. This isn't normal for a television series. For example, with The Hello Goodbye Man we were only making six episodes in a year. With Doctor Who it was twenty-six episodes and that's extremely unusual for a show in this country. It's also another reason why the Doctor Who label tends to stay with you afterwards."

Mary completed her one season of Doctor Who with The Armageddon Factor (which also featured companion to be Lalla Ward) and, (a rare omission) provided no proper leaving scene for Mary. Would she have liked to have had one? "Yes, very much. I was rather annoyed that I wasn't properly written out. I'd said to Graham Williams when I accepted the part 'you have to know, right from the start, I am only going to do the one year'. He'd said 'yes, yes fine', hoping I suspect, that I'd change my mind. And sure enough when the time came and I said this is my last story, he said how much he wanted me to stay on. The character had been highly popular with the viewers and I think to try and persuade me into doing extra time, I didn't get a proper leaving scene. But I had made my position perfectly clear and so I felt rather annoyed by it all."

As it was, nothing the BBC offered Mary could persuade her to stay on in the role and shortly afterwards her successor was named as Lalla Ward - somewhat surprisingly to a continuation of Mary's character. Had Mary liked this idea? "Yes, I thought it was an excellent idea - in fact, I suggested it to Graham. It meant that the character wasn't just identified with me, and it was an imaginative departure for the series."

I suppose it's the fantasy element (in Doctor Who) that catches people's imaginations... I see it as a children's programme that all ages can enjoy. It's not got the sort of violence that offends... nowhere near the level of a lot of imported American shows that children watch, and I think it can be considerably more inventive.

Mary says she was lucky with work after finishing Doctor Who - the highlights being two thriller series filmed for the BBC in a variety of exotic locations: "They have been my favourite television work. After the first one The Assassination Run, we did a sequel,

The Treachery Game, and they were both very good for my career." I asked Mary if she had any unfulfilled acting ambitions: "I've been lucky in that I've fulfilled most of them. I'd always wanted to do a situation comedy and last year I got The Hello Goodbye Man. This year I want to do some more stage work and there are a couple of things looming that aren't definite yet, but which I'm hoping will come off."

One of Mary's other ambitions that recently reached fruition was to take part in a pantomime. Sure enough, John Nathan-Turner's Cinderella provided her with the chance to sing, dance and act her way through a fun packed script, alongside other Doctor Who names such as Colin Baker, Nicola Bryant, Anthony Ainley and Jacqueline Pearce: "The pantomime came about during an American convention in Chicago. They have this cabaret there and I sang a song. John heard me sing in Chicago and asked if I would like to be involved in his production of Cinderella."

Mary enjoyed the pantomime tremendously: "It's been great fun, I've loved it and we all got on so well". She hastened to add that this did not really mark a return to the world of Doctor Who: "There is a connection, that's it." As far as the programme itself, Mary would have had no objections to appearing in something similar to The Five Doctors: "I would actually love to return to the programme as a really evil villain."

In spite of some of the reservations Mary has about Doctor Who and in spite of the fact she is no longer in social contact with her former colleagues on the show, Mary greatly enjoyed her year with the series.

As she herself says: "There is no way I will ever lose the Doctor Who tag now. There is no point in kicking against it or complaining about it. I'm going to several conventions next year, so I'm not turning my back on the show. I suppose really I should be pleased people still care about what I'm doing and are interested in my career as a whole." ☆

MERCHANDISE

KITS

ATARDIS that's too tall, a jigsaw Sontaran which requires the patience of Jove to assemble, a superbly crafted Dalek model and a couple of oddly chosen video releases are amongst the Doctor Who merchandise looked at by Gary Russell in this follow up to last year's Summer Special.

Just under a year ago, when the 1984 Doctor Who Summer Special reached the shops, certain new items were mentioned as 'being in the pipeline'. Now a year later it seems appropriate to take a look at four of those items and see whether they are all really value for money, intended as they are, for the more adult fans of the programme.

Having said that, the first of our 'victims' do in fact produce a range of goods that easily fall into pocket-money category. These are the pewter figurines made by Robert Eastough of Fine Art Castings, based in Hampshire, and at present there are only three different ranges available. The first is a series of 40mm models, some available at under £1 each, and which consist so far of the fifth Doctor, the TARDIS, a Dalek and Turlough. Despite their size, these figures are highly detailed and can be painted or left in their grey images. The Peter Davison figure has, rather oddly, been given a cricket bat to go with his straw hat, but is fine otherwise. The Dalek is, well, a Dalek. But the weakest is actually what ought to be the simplest, the TARDIS. The TARDIS just looks wrong somehow - it is a bit too tall, too thin and generally wrong. The Turlough figure, however, is the best so far of the 40mm set - complete with striped tie and Prince Charles-styled ears! I recommend that figure as a good start if you want to see how good these models could be.

At the other end of the scale, there are the larger (in both stature and price) figures, of which Fine Art Castings are justifiably proud. Available in three forms - a kit, assembled and antiqued, and assembled and hand-painted. The standing humanoid figures all come on a nice polished wooden base, and the whole set is marvellous. However, they are not cheap by any standards - K9 at £15.50 is the cheapest, the Dalek and Davros at just under £7 are the most expensive - but easily worth the pennies.

Leela stands brandishing her knife, Tom Baker offers you a grin and a bag of jelly babies, and K9 looks up, his head on one side. Representing the villains: the Sontaran, which needs no assembly, looks stoically across at Davros, who is complete with perfect headgear, and his one withered arm flicking switches. The head is based, thankfully, on the one John Friedlander created for Genesis of the Daleks, and not the "frustrated Ena Sharples" used in Resurrection of the Daleks.

There are also a Dalek and three Cybermen. One of the latter, presumably a Cyberleader, points, while his lieutenant looks affably on, and a Cyberman from the ranks lies dead, his chest unit meticulously sculptured into a smouldering mess. Incidentally, the Telosians are based on those seen in Revenge of the Cybermen, although an Attack of the Cybermen version is in the pipeline.

The latest range Fine Art Castings have come up with is a series of busts of each Doctor, to be released at monthly intervals from about now. Although very expensive, these are limited editions, and seem destined to become collectors' items. They look very nice lined up on their wooden display plinth, but have a nightmarish Auton-like quality about them, which probably has something to do with their lack of eyes. At just over £11.50 each, they are worth it for the novelty value and limited number - there are only 2,000 available worldwide. All in all, Fine Art Castings' merchandise is excellent, and I look forward to seeing what they come up with in the future.

PIECEMEAL PUZZLES

The next piece of merchandise is very good, very expensive (for what it is) and, for some inexplicable reason, only available in America. Hopefully Waddingtons, producers of exquisite jigsaws for well over two decades, will buck up and get them made in this country very soon. You may remember Waddington's last set of jigsaws - they had photos of Peter Davison crudely glued over pictures of Destiny of the Daleks daleks, and the Master pointing his Tissue Compression Eliminator somewhat wildly at the Doctor. They were horrendous things and a general embarrassment to all. Not so their latest product, which our lucky cousins across the Atlantic already have available to them - four of Andrew Skilleter's excellent profile prints transferred onto oddly shaped lumps of card, just waiting to be put together by eager fans. Which is great if you have six hours to spare and a lot of patience! So far I have attempted the Davros and Daleks and Sontarans ones - and given up on both. Maybe I'm not very good at jigsaws but these are hard to do. I have yet to summon up the courage to fail at K9 and Omega, but if you ever get the opportunity to buy these, do so.

TOM BAKER ON VIDEO

To date, BBC Video, the department of the British Broadcasting Corporation that provides home entertainment for sale to the general public, have released two Doctor Who stories on video. Both are from the much vaunted Philip Hinchcliffe/Tom Baker era of the series, and are rather strange choices. Revenge of the Cybermen has been out just over a year now and is reckoned to be one of the BBC's best-selling video releases. The package contains the entire 90-minute story. Opening with the Doctor, Sarah and Harry landing back on Nerva Beacon after their adventure on Skaro in the Genesis of the Daleks, the next 90 minutes sees the Doctor and Co. facing a cyber-disease, war-mongering Vogans, human double agents and of course the tall silver giants themselves, complete with strange Canadian accents, a pecul-

THE MAGNIFICENT SEVANS

Stuart Evans, a Doctor Who fan who lives in Trowbridge, condensed his name, and just in time for Christmas managed to get his 'Sevans' Dalek construction kits on the market, which sold very well. The wait was long, but the final result is, frankly, superb. Get yourself a long weekend, a bit of glue and paint, patience (and £14.95), and by Monday morning you could have your very own Dalek. Stuart has supplied the ingredients to make any variation on the Daleks from Raymond Cusick's The Daleks right through to the recent Resurrection of the Daleks. It has taken Stuart three years to perfect the kit – on one occasion it seemed to be ready, when he noticed that the shoulders sloped 3mm too far forward, and so there was a delay until that was perfected.

All problems behind them, Sevans are now sending out the high durability plastic kits as fast as they can produce them. They guarantee not to cash despatches until the orders are ready for despatch, but the demand for the kits seems so vast that buyers ought to be prepared for an extension to the 'please wait 28 days' proviso. So, if you want a Dalek for someone's birthday present, make sure you order it well in advance, and do mention what occasion it is for – Sevans will always respond as quickly as possible. The models are not getting overseas in bulk, so if you live abroad it is worth sending off to Sevans personally rather than wait for a specialist shop to get them, as that could take a very long time.

THE RETURN OF DALEKMANIA

The Dalek model is tremendously detailed, but still very easy to construct, and actually quite fun if you like model making. If you don't, get a brother, sister or great Aunt to help you – it is well worth the effort! The finished result is easily the most accurate Dalek ever produced commercially (actually when you compare it to the Daleks seen in stories like Destiny of the Daleks, the Sevans models look more like Terry Nation's meannies than the BBC ones did!). Although the days of Dalekmania are well and truly over as far as major commercial companies are concerned, if more independents like Stuart Evans or

Robert Eastough produce such high quality 'fan' material, maybe the time will come where once again the toy shops will be lined with the popular creatures. Stuart Evans is, incidentally, considering another scale model, this time of K9, complete with removable panels and interior details. The K9 model is provisionally slated for an October '85 release, so keep watching this space ...

Stuart would like to apologise for the delay in the delivery of his Dalek construction kits, which was caused by some last minute production hitches. Rest assured though, the Sevans Daleks will locate their new owners soon. ★

lar gait and the ability to make ironic comments, although they are supposed to be emotionless. Despite that drawback, Revenge of the Cybermen is a jolly little romp, containing some of the best action sequences in the series. It makes very pleasurable watching, especially put together as a continuous story with no breaks every twenty-five minutes.

The climax is rather good, leading into Terror of the Zygons (perhaps this will be released at a later date). Amongst the actors you can spot, under heavy Vogon make-up, are Mawdryn Undead star David Collings (as Vorus), Davros Mk 1, Michael Wisher, as Magrik, Tobias Vaughan himself, and Kevin Stoney as Tyrum. On the human side there's William Marlowe as Lester – he was last seen as the villainous Mailer in John Pertwee's Mind of Evil – and Ronald Leigh-Hunt as Stevenson, he had previously been in Doctor Who back in '69 in The Seeds Of Doom, fighting Ice Warriors. Revenge of the Cybermen might not be the greatest Cyberman story ever, but as a start to what will hopefully become quite a large range of Doctor Who titles, it was an inspired first choice for release.

The Brain of Morbius, release number two in the set, is a slightly different kettle of fish – primarily because, whilst it is another good example of the Hinchcliffe/Baker team, BBC Video have opted to cut it to sixty minutes – that's just under 50 per cent of the story lopped off, like the television repeat we saw back in 1976.

The Brain of Morbius is the better story of the two, but what a shame it has been cut down – one assumes it's for reasons of economy, rather than those of censorship (the hysterical Australian TV network saw fit to cut it to shreds when it was shown over there. I hope that is not a trend that will continue here). Whether any more videos will follow is anybody's guess at the moment, but it seems unlikely that the BBC will stop at two. Maybe we'll get a Pertwee story before too long and perhaps a Troughton or Hartnell one. Perhaps now is the time to drop BBC Video a line and tell them what you think. Meanwhile, try to get a look at

So there you are, four of the best items in the last year or so of Doctor Who merchandise. There are of course the Target books, the odd BBC record (look out for a new double LP called The Fantasy Album which is digitally recorded by the London Symphony Orchestra and features a good version of the theme music), and even the dreadful, overpriced but traditional annual to keep looking for. 1984 was in many ways a good year for merchandise and 1985 is already looking as exciting. Perhaps this time next year, we'll take another look at what is around.

TIME LASH

The all studio recording on Time-Lash, the penultimate story of this season, was a smooth and stylish process, and the soon to be screened result will demonstrate this for all to see. Considering that the regular cast had rehearsals for the Cinderella pantomime between rehearsals for this story, the six days of total videotaping were accomplished as efficiently as usual, giving credit to the stamina of both Colin Baker and Nicola Bryant.

Director Pennant Roberts worked tremendously hard, mostly appearing on the studio floor itself, acting scenes out to show the cast exactly what he was trying to achieve. Pennant, like many other television directors, likes to cast a mixture of actors and actresses, some with whom he has worked before, some who are already well known and who he knows will give a good performance, and others who are totally unknown but need to be given that all important first break. On TimeLash, for instance, Pennant cast Jeananne Crowley, who was one of the first season regulars on Tenko (for which he directed five episodes). Similarly, Denis Carey, who plays the Old Man, has also been involved in Pennant's Shada story. Paul Darrow as Tekker is an established television actor, although he also worked with Pennant on the Blake's Seven show. On the other hand, David Chandler, who plays the intriguing character of Herbert, is a relative newcomer to mainstream television.

With every season there is always at least one story that tends to be made on a lower budget than its contemporaries. However, Doctor Who is no stranger to modest budgets, and TimeLash features some lovely interlocking sets, which, although limited in quantity, greatly increase the planet's citadel. The TimeLash title is a piece of design mastery, and looks absolutely superb in operation.

◆ FROM TRIPODS TO TIMELASH

The two new monsters that make an appearance in the show caused much admiration when seen in action. Visual effects designer Kevin Molloy, fresh from his stint on The Tripods, carefully oversaw many areas of effects in TimeLash. Special use was made of lighting, an aspect of the other ell-studio production this season, Vengeance on Varos. The colour separation overlay process used, it seems, in every Doctor Who for the last few years, has really come into its own. Some of the final picture is now overlaid in the editing stage of the story rather than done 'live' in the studio. Somewhat surprisingly, some of the modelling was done live, and much work was required to get the starfield backdrop registered. The model set itself spent the best part of a day being carefully dressed.

Nicola Bryant's costume for the story is, she says, far more in keeping with her own taste in clothes, consisting, as it does, of black trousers, black boots and a chic corduroy top. Nicola is also growing her hair it seems, with the so far familiar bob set to grow out. One of the best elements of this new story is the Android, endearingly played by actor Dean Hollingsworth, under rather a lot of make-up and an ingenious costume.

For the first studio recording, the Doctor Who team had the use of BBC Television's most advanced studio, with the most up to date technical equipment available. Pennant Roberts made full use of these facilities, especially a wonderful series of shots taken via a camera crane (ie. a camera on a little crane that can move up and down in a soft of sweeping movement). Cranes are used most often on Top of the Pops for all those rapid zooming in shots, and their great advantage is that they give a director much more flexibility than is usual with the normal pedestal cameras.

◆ ACCENT ON ACTION

Much time was spent choreographing a big fight scene, which was well worth it, as the pace of this sequence was very much tighter and more exciting. Pennant spent some time demonstrating exactly how he wanted one actor to die, much to the amusement of all present. Other action sequences that took a long time to set up and then record included an excellent scene where Peri is chased through the Citadel, and another where she is captured by rebels and ruthlessly interrogated.

Episode One of TimeLash will be broadcast on Saturday March 9th, with the following week's concluding episode seeing the two time travellers departing to a new destination for their encounter with the Daleks. Pennant Roberts is confident that his new story will be completed as a very good piece of traditional Doctor Who, and some time in the not so distant future he will be talking to Doctor Who Magazine about all his work for the show.

TimeLash is the least ambitious outing of this season, perhaps, but in its own way remains an example of the programme at its best. Considering its writer, Glen McCoy, is a newcomer to the series this is no mean feat. The tale's combination of mystery, suspense and humour shows some inspiration and much promise.

interview

A highly regarded television director, Christopher Barry's lengthy tenure on Doctor Who left him with some well defined views on the series. He speaks quite candidly in this interview with Richard Marson.

Christopher Barry is without doubt one of this country's foremost television directors, and also one of its most experienced. Literally hundreds of hours of television drama have come under his wing, and within the world of Doctor Who he is second only to the late Douglas Camfield in terms of sheer number of episodes directed. Currently at work on the BBC's latest science fiction show, The Tripods, Christopher Barry shows no signs of wanting to retire from the profession he has made his life.

I asked him how he first had the opportunity to direct in television: "I had been working for the famous Ealing Film studios, then in their heyday, when independent television started up and I decided, in view of the decline of films, to transfer into the new medium. I joined the BBC and it wasn't very long before I was offered the chance of directing. I did an awful lot of stuff, most of it live, including the very first episode of Starr and Company (a soap opera now forgotten by everybody) and some of the Compact serial, before Venty Lambert asked me if I would like to direct for her new series, Doctor Who. I was very keen to, having developed a fascination for special effects whilst working at Ealing, and of course Doctor Who in those days was technically extremely challenging."

DALEK DEBUT

Christopher actually co-directed the first Dalek story with another up and coming BBC man, Richard Martin: "We worked very closely in the planning stages, and because our styles weren't radically different, there weren't any real clashes. The only problems we did experience came from Sydney Newman who had had quite a hand in the creation of the show and didn't like the Daleks at all. I think he felt they were childish science fiction. When I first saw them, though, I was absolutely delighted. Funny enough, I recently watched the first episode again, and I was quite pleased with it. I thought it stood up well and had something of an atmosphere to it. But when I saw the second episode I was a bit depressed - the sets looked too cheap and I thought it was a bit sloppy."

The Daleks, however, succeeded on a phenomenal scale and ensured a second season of Doctor Who. He returned to direct two stories in tandem, The Rescue and The Romans, Christopher recalls some of the intrinsic problems encountered during the production. "The first one, the little two-parter, was a nightmare to direct. It started well enough, with the casting of Maureen O'Brien as the new girl and with my choice of Ray Barrett in the double role of good guy and monster - Koquillon. Both Maureen and Ray went on to very much greater things, but I was glad to have them in my cast. My clearest memory of The Rescue, unfortunately, is sitting in that little control room in the studio, while down on the floor the actors tried to destroy a radio set at the end of the story - only the darned thing wouldn't break. I went outside after the recording, feeling terribly, terribly depressed and Venty followed me saying "It was good, it was good. I liked it. Consequently I didn't care for that one."

The Romans, on the other hand, brings back happier memories. "That was the first one they played purely for comedy and I enjoyed directing it tremendously. It was all done like a farce, and the actors really entered into the spirit of the thing." After finishing work on these six episodes, Christopher took a break from the show before returning during William Hartnell's last year as the Doctor, to direct The Savages. "Hartnell was always fine as far as directing him went. He didn't like to have too much to say, and he could be quite harsh with new directors. I believe, but with me, he knew I was experienced and I respected his film career, so the working atmosphere was good. The Savages was filmed in a disused sand pit and had Ewen Solon as one of its main characters. It wasn't a particularly inspiring script, as I recall, and I think Doctor Who itself was in something of a creative rut at the time. It wasn't a troubled process to do, but it wasn't very challenging either."

The Savages saw Peter Purves leave the programme, something he has been quoted as saying came not a moment too soon. Had Christopher poked up on this feeling at the time? "Not really. Peter certainly felt restricted by the part - as did Maureen and a lot of the other actors involved in the series at one stage or another. To play second fiddle in an adventure show is not the greatest of excitement for an actor, and in those days it was on so long that you really became identified very rapidly with the part. I believe Peter was glad to leave."

Christopher Barry's next venture for Doctor Who was also one of the most significant. In The Power of the Daleks Patrick Troughton inherited the role of the Doctor from William Hartnell. "I remember we discussed a lot of different approaches that Pat could have taken in rehearsal. He ended up doing it totally different from the first ideas, and of course totally different from Hartnell's portrayal. He couldn't have done an imitation of Hannell because as those dreadful Peter Cushing movies had shown there was just no substitute for the real thing. Patrick was truly wonderful to work with on that first drive – and it could have been a very difficult time for the show. I must admit I was surprised that it had gone on after Hannell's departure, but that's television for you.

"It was a great shame I didn't work again on Doctor Who with Patrick, but I had done so before and I thought he was an excellent choice for a Doctor. I think, too, that the programme grew up considerably during his tenure and it became considerably more respected in the business." I asked Christopher if there was a reason for his absence from the show for nearly four years. "Yes, indeed there was. I desperately didn't want to become too associated with the phrase 'Oh he's the man who always does Doctor Who'. Directors can be typecast as easily as actors, and I was very keen to work on all sorts of other drama, not just Who. In fact, as time went on, I got more and more annoyed with the BBC because I kept being assigned to Doctor Who all the time. I fought very hard against this – on occasion I even refused to do it until I was taken seriously – and eventually it influenced my decision to leave the BBC and go freelance."

THE DIRECTOR AND THE DAEMONS

Christopher couldn't have chosen a better vehicle for his return to the series and his directing talent when he came to do The Daemons in 1971: "That was my favourite of all my Doctor Who's, in spite of having quite a few problems to overcome during its production. One of the first was the bizarre weather we got on location. For the first week we got sun, and then during the second week we got snow. It was like a director's worst nightmare. I woke up one morning during the second week, opened the curtains to let in what I thought would be blazing sunlight, only to discover that the bright glare came from a sheet of freak snow that had fallen during the night. I was in despair. We were due to film all the scenes with the Brigadier standing on one side of the heat barrier and the only thing we could do was literally sweep all the snow that would have been in shot to the side and carry on, keeping the camera angles as tight as possible to avoid showing the effects of the weather. It looked very good on screen, but if you watched closely you could see that the grass was soaking wet."

Christopher found making The Daemons one of the most technically demanding experiences for the programme. "We were allowed to use more than the usual number of film cameras on location, but that meant I had to have eyes in the back of my head to make sure everything was coming up on screen. Then in the studio I experimented a lot with the relatively new colour separation overlay (CSO) process, especially with the manifestation of the Daemon itself. To do that we zoomed in as the creature was supposed to grow, and I directed Stephen Thorne to twist around as we did it, so that it looked more effective. All the same it was terribly time consuming."

"The cast all loved it – something to do with the filming I suppose, and I cast Demians Haymen, who I'd seen in an ITV comedy show as exactly the right kind of slightly daffy rural English spinster. Pertwee, of course, was very popular, and in his element at about this time – I remember we drew quite a lot of local interest and he loved it."

The ending of The Daemons constitutes one of the best season conclusions ever, with the victorious Doctor, Jo, Benton, Brigadier, Yates and Miss Hawthorne joining in the celebrations around the May Pole. The final shot was taken from what seemed to be the top of the church, pulling away to show Morris dancers and villagers, as well as Doctor Who regulars all enjoying themselves: "I worked tremendously hard to get that shot as I had envisaged it. We had to bring in special fire fighting equipment to get the camera crew up to the required height for the shot, and it was a complicated job directing everyone in the village from so far away. It would have been easier if they had all been professionals but a lot of the extras were the real villagers."

Christopher remembers trying to build up the atmosphere of the story by using bizarre, distorted camera angles and special lenses to contort the picture. "I really pushed the technical side of that one and because we wanted this devilish atmosphere, it wasn't difficult to know what kinds of effect to aim for.

While he believes The Daemons is his most polished work, Christopher adds: "I was still doing a show that had started some seven years before and from which I felt I now ought to be moving. After The Daemons they wanted me to direct another one almost straight away but I said no and did a classics serialisation of H.G. Wells' novel Love and Mr Lewisham instead."

For the 1972 season, however, Christopher was back in the Doctor Who fold, this time at the helm of one of Jon Pertwee's lesser-known tales, The Mutants, written by Bob Baker and Dave Martin: "That was supposed to be a satire on the British Empire but we played it down, because I don't think that Doctor Who is really the place for such obvious political comment. We filmed it in an old chalk pit, quite a bleak place, and I had the landscape carefully dressed to make it look as unfriendly and alien as possible. We covered the place with specially imported bracken and foliage and then I filed it with special effects smoke. It was freezing cold when we filmed, so that helped rather than hindered, for a change."

Christopher remembers feeling very pleased with the way the mutants themselves turned out: "I liked the design very much and I thought that, when orchestrated, they looked extremely convincing and quite frightening too. The shots where they tumbled into view from shrouds of smoke were my favourites and I approved a sort of high pitched screaming sound for them to make – as if they were in pain."

Technically the show was another quite demanding one with many special effects and considerable use of CSO: "The colour separation overlay was one of the chief drawbacks of the series, and also one of its greatest assets. One could do an awful lot with limited resources using CSO, but one needed a inevitably appearing unconvincing on screen. It took a great deal of time to line up, time which we didn't really have, so the end results were all too often crude and obvious. Today effects work and all the CSO business has advanced to the extent where it's simpler to do things on screen we just couldn't have attempted properly thirteen years ago."

With The Mutants being the last Jon Pertwee story on which Christopher Barry worked, it was to be another debutante Doctor who marked the next occasion on which he directed a story. "The first Tom Baker story, Robot, which was another period of change for the programme. I didn't enjoy it nearly as much as I might have done had there not been an industrial dispute at the BBC at the time we were shooting. Funny enough it had nothing to do with the next two occasions to direct a story with him. By the following year and The Brain of Morbius he was totally at his ease, supremely confident and not as unquestioning. By The Creature from the Pit, he was really very difficult to direct, very dominant and with an awful lot of pre-conceived ideas as to how the show should be appearing. He was also getting tired more easily because he'd taken on a lot of publicity work, and, of course, he was getting older and feeling the strain of playing such a demanding part for so long."

The Brain of Morbius drew complaints over its horrific nature from Mary Whitehouse, I asked Christopher for his opinion: "I didn't know that, to be honest. I think it's an irrelevant complaint. I always made Doctor Who to be pleasantly frightening, not genuinely terrifying. I actually feel somewhat insulted to be so criticised considering my track record in television. I simply do not make horror movies for Doctor Who. You can't. What violence there was seemed fairly 'comic strip' to me."

The Brain of Morbius also featured the famous joke of having the production team's faces used in the mental battle between the Doctor and Morbius: "That happened because I couldn't find any Equity actors' faces that fitted the requirements of the script in time. So we all stepped in, via a quite amusing in-joke. I gather the story has now been released on video which is nice – and means every one can see that bit again."

Christopher Barry's last Doctor Who to date has also ranked as his least favourite:

The monster is such an important part of a Doctor Who plot, that if it fails, the whole serial tends to be ruined. I didn't really care for the way the show had changed in my absence either – it had become a bit silly and difficult to control.

do with new technology, as the strikes often are, but scenery shifting troubles. We did all our location stuff without any hiccups but when it came to the studio sessions there were delays and there was a pretty horrible, tense feeling running through the whole building. One doesn't like to work when there are disputes involving one's colleagues in a strike, and I think we had to have a remount on Robot."

A SECOND FIRST

Since Tom Baker was the second Doctor who Christopher had directed in his first story, I wondered whether there were any teething problems: "Not insoluble ones, no. Tom was nervous, of course, I don't think he quite understood how it had all happened to him, but he worked very hard from scratch to be as different from Jon as he possibly could. He was always a loner, but in rehearsal for that first one he established himself quite quickly as the star – which is as it should be. I was very struck with the difference in Tom when I returned

The monster was this kind of huge glowing plastic bag, some of which we tried to do at Ealing for conviction's sake. In the end it didn't work at all, and I find the whole experience of that story unpleasant to talk about as a result. The monster is such an important part of a Doctor Who plot that if it fails, the whole serial tends to be ruined. I didn't really care for the way the show had changed in my absence either – it had become a bit silly and difficult to control."

Christopher thinks it is unlikely that he will ever return to the programme now, in spite of the fan mail he receives and the fond memories of his work: "I didn't like the Peter Dawson Doctor at all, although Peter himself is charming and we worked together on All Creatures Great and Small very happily. I like Colin Baker as an actor but I've yet to see his version. I don't think it's likely that I'll be asked to direct again, though before the offer I couldn't say definitely yes or no. I'm grateful to Doctor Who for what it gave me, but I've rather moved on now and it probably wouldn't be a good idea to go back."
